The year is 2085. A megalopolis city called Planet SARAT, which is 15km in diameter, is the final destination of the space tourism. However, a journey at a mega-city is a terrible experience, and 99.9% of the people who ride the space ships are eventually forgotten. Now, 70 years after the final destination, Planet SARAT is slowly decaying, and the people can't keep the sky-blue sapphire flowers on their gravestones. LectroVolt II (also known as LectroVolt Rb and LVII), styled LECTRO-VOLT II and formerly also as LC2, was a Russian anti-ballistic missile program. It was a demonstrator of a launcher for an intercontinental ballistic missile whose flight tests lasted from 1990 to 1998. The development of LectroVolt II ended with the signing of the "Inter-Government Agreement Between the Government of Russia and the Government of the United States of America on the Disposition of the Cold War-Era Nuclear Weapons" on June 14, 1998. Project The LVII was a dual-purpose spacecraft that combined active radar with kinetic kill vehicles. Its hypersonic boost phase would knock enemy ballistic missiles out of the sky with kinetic kill vehicles based on the Kinetic Multipurpose Effects Vehicle (KMEPV) high-altitude experimental space vehicle, while the Persistent Threat Defeat System (PTDS) would provide a means to detect the targets and maneuver for the kinetic kill vehicle to hit. A large rocket was used for docking to the LVII. The stress was necessary to safely launch the satellite into orbit. The rocket was used to test a new type of hypersonic rocket to take the satellite to orbit. It was able to carry a payload weight of more than. The military services all considered the project too risky and, in addition, considered the fact that the Soviet Union no longer existed. The project was cancelled in the 1990s. The Theoretical Establishment of its Operative Capabilities was completed in the late 1980s. Initial development Soviet ballistic missile research programs conducted the technological flight tests of crewed, unmanned, and hypersonic versions of the LC2 on high-altitude platforms in the 1980s. The initial military objective of the project was to design a 20,000 m.+ altitude crewed reentry vehicle for manned spaceflight that could be used to test the new active defense technology-based weapon systems on a very large scale. It was an all-Soviet project with a significant US contribution. The design paper of the first version of the project was published in 1987 at the Pechora Polygon (the Polygon of the Mountains of the North). Researchers considered whether such a system could be tested in space. It was intended to have flight testing on Luna and L1. Only 1 design model of this first version of the project
